Nonverbal sensitivity and success in human-dog interaction

Background

Some human-dog interactions seem more successful than others. Dogs use nonverbal signals to communicate and human nonverbal sensitivity might therefore affect the success of human-dog interaction.

Aim

To do preliminary investigation of the relationship between nonverbal sensitivity and success in dog interaction.

Method

- Subjects: 25 dog owners trainers (age 31-71 years) took the PONS test.
- Questionnaire: self-assessed ability to handle dogs
- 2 subjects were evaluated by a skilled dog trainer on different aspects of dog interaction

Conclusion

- Nonverbal sensitivity might affect how comfortable people feel about handling unknown dogs.
